SYNOPSIS

In the extreme west of the state of Amazonas, there is a forest region on the Colombia-Peru-Brazil triple border called the Javari Valley. This land, demarcated and protected by the state, has the highest concentration of isolated indigenous groups in the world. Ethno-environmental protection of isolated and recently contacted individuals, in addition to their human, anthropological, and historical value, also ensures the physical boundaries and natural wealth of the areas where these populations are present. This significantly contributes to reducing deforestation in the Amazon. One of these ethnic groups is the Korubos, known for their warrior and nomadic traditions and their historical conflict with the Matis, from the same region. In 2015, a certain number of Korubos were separated from their original group during one of these conflicts and made their first contact with Funai, the government agency responsible for protecting indigenous rights. They started to live near the protection base, hoping to reunite with their relatives one day, who might already be dead. In 2019, the largest and one of the most important expeditions in the history of the Amazon Forest was carried out to establish contact with a group of isolated Korubos. The aim was to promote family reunion, provide health care, and appease ethnic conflicts

NOTES FROM THE DIRECTOR

The film tells the story of an expedition carried out deep in the Amazon rainforest to seek out and establish first contact between isolated indigenous people and non-indigenous people. It was more than a month of expedition, counting several and several days of long walks. To feed us, it was necessary to kill any possible animal that appeared in front of us and carry it until the end of the day, when we camped for the night. At a certain point, I was one of those responsible for the carrying part of the food, which in this case was a monkey. As I was always filming, holding the camera, no hands free, I hung the monkey on my head in the same way the indigenous people do. When we found the first two isolated Indigenous, I dropped the dead monkey on the ground to be able to work better, and in perhaps the most emblematic moment of the sequence (or of the entire film), when the two isolated indigenous celebrated finding the brother who was traveling with us (and who they had thought was dead) they crouched hugging each other next to the same monkey corpse that I had left on the ground, singing and crying copiously.
